Guilty Crown is one of those anime that can only truly be enjoyed if you have never watched any of the titles that it takes its inspirations from - and that becomes a problem if one has watched, and enjoyed, most of them. The main issue is that there are several character types and plot elements that are better used in their original anime, so their inclusion here makes them stand out in less ...

Guilty Crown can best be summed up as an action-packed anime that utilizes a range of tried and tested tropes, animated in the best way possible. Indeed, a lot of critics have lambasted the show for using plot devices and character templates that have already been used in the past. However, just as many fans of the anime have praised it for doing the very same thing. After all, most anime ...

in guilty crown the protagonist is only able to wield his power by pulling the soul of another person. If he breaks that soul they die and he carries that guilt and shame of not being able to do anything alone. Just like a king may "technically" rule a country but only on top of the shoulders of the people who believe in him and the soldiers who die for him. And typical of the shounen genre ...

Guilty Crown has been kinda like a badly planned in-class essay. They wrote the introduction well, but once they got into the 'body' of the story, it's like they started to go off sense and wrote unnecessary and incomprehensible bits because they were rushing and not checking if it made sense or not. They need to plan story before they actually animate. (Measure twice, cut once)
